

For Breeding Purposes?

Written by Melanie - Last Updated Sunday, 07 October 2012 21:43

Unfortunately we rarely sell kittens for breeding purposes. We adore our babies and want the best for them and consequently we like to find wonderful pet homes for them where they can be spoilt and live a life of luxury.

As there are a number of breeders out there that I don't believe house or treat their breeding stock appropriately we decided that selling to breeders was not something that we wanted to focus on. We have also found a lot of breeders to be dishonest and make enquiries about buying our kittens indicating they want them as a pet rather than for breeding purposes.

I also receive a lot of enquiries about selling cats for breeding purposes, an example of one that I received in October 2012 is below:

Dear Melanie,

Question:

I was thinking about getting a female and male Burmese to breed. I'm getting an electric fence for my back yard to keep the cats in. I have a domestic & Ragdoll desexed. Would the Tom fight with my other cats. Would the Tom spray in the house?

We expect people to have done their research and have a considerable idea of what they are getting into prior to contacting us and this page here is certainly worth a read: To breed or not to breed

I don't believe that an electric fence is a suitable way to house and enclose cats (we are dealing with a Lion or another form of big cat) and anyone that needs to ask if a Tom would spray in the house clearly hasn't done their research. Please think and really consider this decision. It is not one to be made lightly.

Most of our breeding girls are under restrictions from the blood lines they came from heavily
